Mr. William Fenton, who first saw Arizona as a volunteer in the California column, and who has ever since that time resided in the southern part of the Territory, died at the hospital, of hemorrhage, on Tuesday morning, and was buried the same after-noon. He had been ill for quite a long time but his death was not expected so soon. He was about 42 years of age, and for many years had managed freighting and other teams, often meurring risks and dangers from hostile Indians that would in themselves make up an an exciting history of adventure.
